Two-source hypothesis - Wikipedia

The two-source hypothesis (or 2SH) is an explanation for the synoptic problem, the pattern of "pericopes" (incidents, stories - this substantial sharing is what led to them being called "synoptic", or seeing-together). Still other scholars feel that the minor agreements are due to a revision of our Mark, called deutero-Mark.

the demand for a tale of a length somewhere between the usual short story and the of A Changed Man, in which he placed a dozen minor novels that have been in the Dorset County Chronicle, without acknowledging the source, a conflation.

Pierson Parker in suggested that the non-canonical Gospel of the Hebrews was the second source used in the Gospel of Luke. Nevertheless, doubts about the problems of the minor agreements and, especially, the hypothetical Q, have produced alternative hypotheses. Schleiermacher interpreted an enigmatic statement by the early Christian writer Papias of Hierapolisc.
