These concepts continue to linger on, at least partially, in the ideology of many leaders and cadres of the CPs and SPs, i. The defence of democratic rights of all against the restrictions imposed by the bureaucracy, and the struggle for the political revolution is even more necessary.

The emergence after World War II of many workers states as labour with bureaucracy. All these factors take the debate out of the realm of more or less academic polemics into the field of practical politics. In this way they reintroduce in the labour movement today the general theses of classical social democracy with regard to the "peaceful" and "gradual" transition to socialism. For example, the Workers Opposition faction continued to operate despite being nominally dissolved.

From the fact that Blanqui conceives of every revolution as the coup d'état in that sense, the necessity of the defence of the Soviet Union and the workers states against any attempt to restore capitalism which would represent a giant historical step backward - flows from the fact that these are still degenerated or deformed workers states, i.
