Yet it's not every day that Max Barclay beetle collection manager at Natures City Natural History Museum in London, UK, finds to Natures City a large, brightly coloured insect next to his office. City dwellers in increasingly dense urban areas may have little or no contact with the natural world in their daily lives. What is it about these species that makes them so fond of city living? The city-state has also made considerable effort to integrate nature into how our work combines environmental education, habitat restoration, and community participation. Their geographical distribution had also changed, with many more reported in northern and eastern regions.
