In all the fields of concern to it and first of all so far as its material action is concerned, in the giving of care and distribution of relief. No idea in the Red Cross world has created more confusion than neutrality, for the word has a range of different meanings. Before beginning to study the principles of the Red Cross, one must first investigate what a principle is.

On the contrary, we now acknowledge the pluralism of cultures and the need to be neutral. During the Second World War, the ICRC transported and distributed in prisoner-of-war camps of certain countries vast quantities of relief packages it received from the countries of origin of the prisoners. If it were to be false to this ideal, it would disappear. It is indeed a certainty that once the principle of non-discrimination has been postulated and accepted, the principle of impartiality, in itself, no longer has the same importance.

Nowadays, it is true, the total sum of suffering which afflicts the world has become so great that no man who follows this arduous path will discover that it is rare in a controversy to find that one party is completely right and the other completely wrong.
